Time spotlights NYC tech start-ups

As New York City's Silicon Alley continues to grow, Time magazine on Thursday released its new list of top 10 tech start-ups to watch.

"Each year, the temperature of NYC's start-up scene seems to get turned up another five degrees, with 2013 yielding by far the largest number and widest spectrum of companies for our judging committee to consider," said Mark Golin, Time Inc.'s Style & Entertainment Group editor in a statement.

The 2013 list highlights city-based companies that are transforming the way people date, workout and connect online.

Erica Bell, one of the co-founders of the on-line shopping platform Hukkster, which was included in the list, said the city was a natural spot for the company's headquarters.

"Our conversations with retailers come so easily being in New York, as much as we might like the weather in California," Bell said.

Doug Imbruce, founder and CEO of video and editorial software company Qwiki, also said the city was integral to his company's success.

"Qwiki is a unique combination of art and science," Imbruce said. "The energy and diversity of NYC are key to maintaining this careful balance."

"Silicon Valley is thriving and we want to be part of a rising tide," said Klooff CEO and co-founder Alejandro Russo. (ANNA SANDERS)

MLS: Deal close for Queens soccer stadium

MLS Commissioner Don Garber expressed hope on Thursday that Major League Soccer will be prepared to announce "in four to six weeks" that it has finalized plans to build a 25,000-seat stadium in Flushing Meadows-Corona Park, for a 20th league franchise.

The facility, which will cost $320 million to $340 million, would be financed by a yet-to-be named ownership group.

There is an urgency, to complete a lease to build in Flushing's public park before Mayor Michael Bloomberg, stadium supporter, leaves office. (NEWSDAY)

Kids wanted for mugging in Central Park

Police are searching for a couple of youthful would-be muggers accused of trying to grab a woman's purse in Central Park Monday night.

The 38-year-old woman was walking in Central Park near Fifth Avenue and East 107th Street at 8 p.m. when a young girl, between 12 and 14, demanded her cellphone, police said.

When the woman refused, a boy about 10 or 11 tried to rip off her pocketbook.

Both fled after the incident.

Cops are also looking to identify a 14-year-old girl seen with the pair in a surveillance video. (AMNY)
